Dear Friend:

The little red schoolhouse has disappeared from the American countryside. With it has gone a way of life. Gone is the primitive room with earthen floor, pot-bellied stove, split-log desks, quill pen and "rod of correction." Technology has played its part in the development of the physical environment of the classroom. Psychology has shown its influence in the transition from the "rod of correction" method to permissive control. You have seen, in your young lifetime, an example of this change in street traffic signs. "Stop" signs are being replaced with ones reading "yield." Signs reading "dangerous hill, shift gears" are replaced with such signs as, "she said 'go slow'; he said, 'I will'; you'll find their grave on the other hill." Such advice presupposes that the individual is capable of self control and mature judgment. It is complimentary to the individual and society.

The hope of civilization rests in the reconciliation of technological growth with sociological development.

"Live to learn that you may learn to live."

Sincerely yours,
John W. Khouri
